PREFACE.

NO man appears as a candidate for publick favour, without ſome degree of anxiety; and, humble as the taſk may be which has been performed by the Compiler of the following ſheets, he is unwilling to intrude himſelf abruptly upon the world, and therefore begs leave to introduce his work with a few conciliating obſervations.

IT is not his intention, in this prefatory addreſs, to ſay any thing upon the queſtion concerning the advantage and diſadvantage of Entails. Upon that queſtion, very different opinions have been maintained by able writers, — ſome extolling them, as the only means of preſerving ancient families, the pillars of civil ſociety, — and others decrying them, as inconſiſtent with commercial proſperity. Perhaps, a middle opinion may be formed, by which the propriety of Entails may be juſtified, if only a certain proportion of the lands of any country ſhall be permitted to have the privilege of being ſecured againſt alienation, while enough is left free to excite induſtrious ambition, which will be ſtrengthened by the hope, that what it ſhall acquire may be rendered permanent.

But whatever may be the wiſdom or policy of Entails, there is no doubt that they at preſent form an important part of the Conſtitution of Scotland; and, therefore, it is at leaſt a matter of very general and intereſting curioſity, to know, who are the perſons, and what are the lands to whom perpetuity is annexed, as far as is poſſible, in the uncertain and tranſitory ſtate of human affairs.---- Uncertain and tranſitory indeed they are,—of which the Regiſter of Entails itſelf affords ſtriking proofs; for we there find, that many families, which, when the entails were made, flouriſhed in the higheſt eminence, and ſpread their numerous branches around, have, in the courſe of a few generations, decayed and become utterly extinct.

It is not, however, as an object of curiosity only, that this INDEX of ENTAILS is offered to the Publick. The Compiler means that it should also be of considerable utility, both to proprietors of entailed estates, and to people in general who may have occasion to deal with them. —— To a man whose intentions are prudent and honest, it is no advantage to have a more extensive credit than belongs to his share of property; and the consciousness that the world is acquainted with his situation, is an additional motive to moderation and œconomy. To the infinite number of men in all departments, who may be deceived by those who have the appearance of large estates, it is surely a most important caution, to be informed, that those estates are held by a tenure, the influence of which ceases with the life of the possessor. What is now mentioned, is sufficiently plain, and will not be relished the worse that it is delicately expressed.

SUCH being the purposes which this compilation may serve, reasonable hopes may be entertained, that it will meet with an indulgent reception. —— The Compiler offers an acknowledgment of sincere gratitude titude to Mr. Campbell, the keeper of the Record of Entails, for the very obliging and liberal manner in which that Gentleman has been pleased to treat him.

The Compiler cannot flatter his vanity with expectations of the praise due to genius or abilities, from a performance which admits of neither. But it is a satisfaction to think, that while those who aspire to such praise are often deceived,—he, whose sole merit consists in attention, labour, and accuracy, may be more certain that he has done well what he purposed to do. The Compiler therefore trusts, that, as his claim is not extensive, he will not be disappointed in obtaining his reward.
